Eicosapentaenoic acid is superior to docosahexaenoic acid in improving lipid metabolism in a triple-transgenic mouse model of Alzheimer's disease. Alzheimer's disease (AD) is the most prevalent form of dementia, affecting the elderly. AD is a complex neurodegenerative disease associated with multiple pathogenic mechanisms and therapeutic approaches. While metabolism of fatty acids is known to be altered in AD, eicosapentaenoic acid (EPA) may provide a safer alternative to docosahexaenoic acid (DHA). We investigated the effects of dietary EPA vs. DHA in 2-, 4-, 6- and 10-month-old triple-transgenic (3xTg-AD) mice. Dietary EPA significantly increased brain levels of EPA and arachidonic acid (AA), decreased AA and DHA levels, and increased EPA/AA ratio in 2-month-old mice. EPA decreased 3-hydroxybutyrate (3-OHB) levels and increased acetylcarnitine (AC) levels in 6-month-old mice. In 10-month-old mice, EPA also reduced 3-OHB and increased AC levels. In 2-month-old mice, EPA and DHA significantly decreased 3-OHB and increased AC levels. We also evaluated the effects of dietary EPA and DHA on amyloid plaque load and plaque-associated glial cells. In 2-month-old mice, EPA reduced amyloid plaque load and decreased neuroinflammation. In 6-month-old mice, EPA and DHA reduced amyloid plaque load. EPA decreased astrocyte and
