Influence of exercise training on left ventricular efficiency as assessed by strain rate imaging. We evaluated the effects of physical training on the values of mechanical efficiency as measured by the slope of the linear function relating myocardial work and myocardial oxygen consumption during exercise as estimated by the stress-rate (SR) method. The study consisted of 10 physically trained (P) and 10 sedentary (S) men, 35 +/- 5 and 32 +/- 5 years old (P vs. S) with similar levels of exercise tolerance (maximal oxygen consumption, VO2max) as evaluated by the treadmill stress test (P: 5.6 +/- 0.9 vs. S: 5.2 +/- 0.7 l.min-1.m-2). Mechanical efficiency at VO2max as measured by the SR method was 24 +/- 3% in P vs. 22 +/- 3% in S (NS). Values of the oxygen cost/work ratio at the onset of the exercise test were 0.012 +/- 0.001 in P and 0.012 +/- 0.001 in S (NS). On the basis of a theoretical limit of mechanical efficiency, calculated by the Fick equation, we observed values of 22 ± 3 and $23 \pm 3\%$ in P and S, respectively. No differences in the values of mechanical efficiency at VO_2max between P and S could thus be observed, at least in our study. "That comes from the personal experience I've had with people who have gone through something with me and have become my friends." Especially with former teammates, there can be a bit of a divide because of what happened in London. You weren't really in the same division, so I think it's kind of tough to
