What about your marriage? “Octopus bites” or “Razor’s edge” – whatever you call them, these are the marks that cut through the skin, but really stay in your body. The reason for the razor’s edge effect The part of the razor’s edge that grows into the body, is the mineral called calcium carbonate or calcium carbonicum. The reason that you have sharp pieces of bone that remain, is that the protein collagen, which is used in the formation of bones, also forms a bond with the calcium carbonate. And after a month, the mineral dissolves and is reabsorbed in the body. What is the reason that the capsule stays in the skin and not in the body? When an octopus bites, it lacerates the skin with razor-sharp speed. When the blood fills the wound, it binds calcium carbonate to the protein in the blood that is the factor leading to the formation of the capsule, which stays on the surface of the skin. What does it mean? If you have a bruise after an octopus bite, it means that the blood filled the laceration, which then filled with calcium carbonate (the razor’s edge), and together with the proteins in the blood, formed a capsule. When the blood washed away, the proteins in the form of calcium carbonate still remained, and the skin therefore retained it. This is what causes the scar. What does it mean when my body is covered in scars? If your body is covered in scars, it means that you
