I have some questions regarding this. If i don't have IOS 6 push notification support in app than what difference is it to use IOS 5 push notification support without push notification support in the app? If i have to use IOS 6 push notification support in the app. What is the reason to use it in the app? If i don't use IOS 6 push notification support in app, i need to use Apple Push Notification service (APNS) instead of IOS 6 push notification support as Apple push notification service is required to use when IOS 6 support is not present in the app. Then why Apple use their own software instead of using IOS 6 push notification support in the app? If i use IOS 6 push notification support in the app, then i have to tell app id in the app, but i never used my own app id for that. Then how can I use IOS 6 push notification support in the app? A: If you don't have IOS6 support (including the updated notification center) you have to implement the standards provided by Apple. The only way to implement push notifications to Apple's standards and have the user accept the notifications is to use Apple's framework. You can also implement the notification centre but that requires you to implement the push architecture. If you want to use push notifications you can either use Apple's framework to implement push notifications or use a third party push notification service that includes your own app id (like UrbanAirship). It really depends on what you need. 12/3/2008 @ 3:45PM China's A-List In a country with 1.3 billion people, finding someone who is not well-known is
