Cra was. The diagnostic value of brainstem auditory evoked potentials in children with Down syndrome. To evaluate the diagnostic value of the brainstem auditory evoked potentials (BAEPs) in children with Down syndrome. We compared BAEPs in 48 children with Down syndrome, who were aged 4-8 years, and in a control group of 28 healthy children matched for age, gender and socio-economic level. We recorded brainstem auditory evoked potentials from the right and left ears using Nicolet Viking IV equipment. In the control group, the latency and amplitude of waves I, III, V and the interpeak latency of waves III-V and I-III showed a statistically significant difference between both ears in the control group. However, in the group with Down syndrome, no such statistically significant difference was seen for any of the tested parameters. Since there were no statistically significant differences in the BAEPs in children with Down syndrome, we believe that it is not necessary to use BAEPs as a screening test for hearing loss in children with Down syndrome. President Barack Obama on Tuesday ruled out extraditing imprisoned WikiLeaks founder Julian Assange to the United States, saying his right to a fair trial would be compromised. Speaking in London at the G20 summit of world leaders, Obama said he had asked Britain's Home Secretary Theresa May for assurances that Mr Assange would be treated "fairly". "If we had evidence that he was going to be given a fair trial in the UK, I would be on a one-on-one basis with the Justice Department to make sure it happens," Obama told reporters on a separate gaggle. "But I have already said that there are ongoing criminal investigations, and that makes it harder for us to extradite him." Obama, who has not raised the issue of Mr Assange's case directly with Russian President Vladimir Putin, insisted that Britain should take the lead in any extradition attempt, but added that "how that is structured is something that the Justice Department has to work on."
