..... Oct 20, 2019 The behind-the-scenes unreleased short film was made by Sega in 1994 as an argument for the Sega CD to be able to play CD-Audio. The film's title is "Inside the CD-Audio System". It is not known why it was scrapped. The film was not released to the public until 2019 due to the fact that most of its content was not ready, and the short-lived and discontinued Sega CD was not capable of storing the full film. Contents The film consists of a mock advertisement (with voice-overs provided by the narrator and the video journalist) that was supposed to promote the Sega CD, as well as a behind-the-scenes look at the internal workings of the CD-audio system, as well as the software that Sega was intending to have running on the Sega CD. It is supported by various voices over the opening and ending music, to clearly identify each voice as belonging to one of the videos in the film. Some of the facts that the viewer is shown are: The Sega CD was originally conceived as a second video game console. It was expected to have a CD-ROM and a Sega CD card. The CD-ROM, as well as the Sega CD-

ROM, will have a "real" video file attached, and the software that was going to be resident on the CD-ROM will be real applications (although this was later abandoned). The CD-ROM audio will be stereo, and the Sega CD audio will be 5.1. The first CD-ROM titles (referred to by the narrator as games) were to be "Year of the Comet", which was the demo for "The 7th Saga" and "NHL

'94". This documentary was to be a voice-over for the opening theme song to the fourth Sonic game, Sonic the Hedgehog 4, and an additional voice-over, in which the narrator explained the subliminal message hidden in it: Other interesting facts about this short are: The name "Tecnodata" is a reference to the three-dimensional and two-dimensional representations of data.

The Sega CD and Sega CD-ROM were not nearly as big as they are today, at only about the size of a Nintendo Powerpak. The main reason 570a42141b
