Virtual Sound Canvas VST by Roland and many other programs. Background Art "Hot dip" type stainless steel (hereinafter abbreviated as "SUS") has a martensitic crystal structure comprising a Fe-Ni base metal and has heat treatment characteristics such that it can easily be converted from a ferritic or a martensitic crystal structure into an austenitic crystal structure. A stainless steel is therefore an alloy which is heat resistant and has a good corrosion resistance, and is generally applied to component parts of electronic equipment, etc. as a material of the parts of the apparatus which are exposed to a high temperature. A stainless steel is generally produced by adding nitrogen to steel and reducing the adding amount so as to increase the strength of steel and thereby produce a stainless steel of an excellent corrosion resistance. However, a stainless steel is a material of which precipitation hardening strength can be easily increased, and in the case where the hardness is increased, there has been a problem in that the material is easily damaged. The reason for this is that, when an attempt is made to increase the hardness of a stainless steel in order to increase the strength thereof, the sectional area of austenite which is a softer phase tends to decrease, resulting in a decrease of strength, and an increase of tensile strength due to the precipitation of the martensite as a hard phase cannot be expected. In order to solve this problem, the austenite phase is dissolved by the formation of a fine carbide of Cr or the like, thereby increasing the hardness of the material as a whole. However, in this case, a material having a uniform microstructure cannot be obtained, and if the hardness of the material is to be increased in a certain region, the hardness in other regions has to be decreased. In order to solve this problem, a method has been proposed
