All of them belong to different translators, but they have a single principle of construction: the quotation and translation are omitted, it is translated into Russian by another, the original verse is included in the general plot and only then into French. The task is to convey the meaning of the original and give a translation into French, and all this is quite simple. I have deliberately chosen many translations so that you can compare how different the experience of a translator can be. This collection contains examples of a wide variety of reading options: sometimes itâ€™s just interesting to compare how poetry was actually read in Russian and how it is done in French. I post everything to at least partially compensate translators for their living expenses - translations from RÃ©ponse pour un Paris. Here you can see prices for the entire range of prices, and even more can be found below, in my blog: and in LiveJournal: <http://lucker.livejournal>. All my translations are copyrighted from generation to generation. My translators have only purchased the rights to the Russian translations, in effect buying the rights to the French translations made by my friends, and for them I get the right to use them in any way I like. This is called "renting a translation" and related to this is the easiest way to register the copyright for a translation. The translation is called the "original source" and the source is the original. Therefore, you can use my translations, using my rights to them. I myself write the translation for myself and act as a translator for myself. I want to draw your attention to the fact that by law you may be prohibited from using my translations. In this article, I talk about what rights a translator must have in order to use them legally. In fact, I joined the European Union a long time ago as an equal participant in the translation services market. It was there and it is now that laws regulating translation services have appeared and are in force. These laws define and protect the rights of an interpreter by using Latin characters rather than Cyrillic. In any case, I am happy to try to help, and happy to offer any help to those who really need it. Daily
