In 1996, Republican President William J. Clinton and Democratic presidential candidate Bob Dole faced off in a battle for Florida's 29 electoral votes. As the Republican nominee for Florida governor, I stood on my party's doorstep and challenged the people of the state. I made the case for President Clinton, and for the Republican brand of "compassionate conservatism." I never wavered in my belief that Bill Clinton understood how to lead and build a stronger America. By contrast, Bob Dole – in a fit of fury — called the people of Florida "rednecks" who only knew how to handle "guns and God," and who needed to be put back in their place. Standing by his words, Bob Dole turned off the voters of Florida. He locked them in a partisan straitjacket and filled the state with bitterness. His words and actions hurt people in Florida – including Bob Dole. The debate over whether or not to vote for President Barack Obama in 2012 has been limited to the fringe, thanks in part to the feckless Joe Biden. The moderates in the GOP like to pretend that all they have to do is nominate a moderate who can beat the incumbent (in this case, President Obama). That is nonsense. If the Republican moderates like Jeb Bush and George Pataki had a chance to debate for the nomination, I doubt there would be any doubts about who the nominee would be. We have so far seen the hand-wringing and finger-pointing of Republican strategists, including those who claimed Mitt Romney could have beaten President Obama. The truth is that we can't really know. All we know is that the President won by a clear margin. In the four states won by Romney – Virginia, Colorado, Wisconsin and Iowa – all of the counties that voted Obama were vastly more diverse than the 9df0af710a
