Convert the Blu-ray to iPad. Quick, easy, and no codec installation required. What's New in Version 2.0.1.1: - Optimize the performance.Q: CSS Autoload I created a dropdown menu for my website using pure CSS. I know how to create and use the CSS code for the menu but am I using the best way to load the CSS when the user clicks on a link. Right now I'm using the following: `$(document).ready(function() { $("#menu a").click(function() {
$("#content").load("index.php?p=lst");
});
});` I have the PHP code in the same file as the menu. Is this the best way to do it? A: If your menu and content are in the same file, it's a bad idea to use Ajax, as it'll add unnecessary load time to the page. If you use the load method, that load() method is going to include all HTML (including the header, etc.), and will load the entire content of that file. This isn't really a problem if you don't need all the HTML, but in your case, you do, so you'd be better off setting up your menu using pure CSS. You could have your menu in its own file, and your content in another. For example: menu.html Action content.html Content of your page Then you'd make your "Click to load" anchor a link to menu.html, and add this JavaScript: `$("#menu").load('menu.html');` This would
