An experimental study of the performance of a new implantable, remote needle with ultrasonic echocardiography. The purpose of this study was to compare the performance of a new, remote, implantable needle, the echocardiographic needle (ECHO-N), with a standard PTH needle in a model of human myocardium. Eight swine hearts were studied. In four hearts, a standard 0.018-in. distal PTH needle (ECHO-N A) was inserted into the right ventricle and a 0.018-in. proximal ECHO-N (ECHO-N B) was placed in the right atrium, 7-8 cm distal to the right ventricular insertion site. Myocardial blood flow was measured with a microsphere technique. Baseline perfusion values were 1.45 +/- 0.38 (ECHO-N A) and 1.79 +/- 0.41 ml/min
