It's already transforming how educators teach kids, with a new approach to grading, and changing the entire system of education. And now, thanks to new data by linguist and author Steven Pinker, we are seeing how it's also inching towards something darker—namely, changing the way we judge people, and who gets put into internment camps. Much of the work of Pinker, who has a history of doing important and often controversial work in the world of social science, has focused on language and rationality. This work is vital—after all, we all know that language is a powerful tool and that understanding words and meaning is part of what defines us as human beings. But recently, Pinker has been using his expertise in that field in order to analyze two other issues—racism and internment. His newest book, The Better Angels of Our Nature, unpacks some of the troubling origins of both of those issues, and makes a powerful argument about how we can turn them around. Hence my title—the direction where an entire society starts is not up to the enlightened elites. Although that change is afoot, and has been for a while, it is still very much the case that the vast majority of humanity at this moment is not suffering under the dominion of a greater, more enlightened evil. I want to dig into this a little bit, as it has
