How to Use Your Phone as a Proximity Sensor in Android Without Root No root, No pairing, just start the app. You want to run a Bixby action or notification by touching your phone with your eyes. You want to listen to your friend's voice and know when to answer the call. You need your phone to wake itself up to turn on when you approach or when it's going to sleep. And of course, you have to know which direction your phone is facing. Or maybe you want to test a library that requires proximity data to work. You probably know that the proximity sensor has already been implemented in Android, but you still want to know how to use it with minimal interaction. With Android 8.0, the sensor API is official. You can use the Android SDK to access the sensor, which is available since API 27. But if you don't want to tie your phone in the SDK and the target Android API level is lower, there are no ready-to-use apps. So, you need to develop your own app with a lot of hard work. Luckily, we can use the binary XML encoding to f988f36e3a
