Understand that a web designer is very much like a craftsman or a tradesman. Anyone can be trained to craft a good wood table, but that doesn't make them a woodworker or carpenter. It takes a long-term commitment to learn and experience all about woodworking so that you can make things of high-quality. Photoshop has become something of a trademark and a standard in the art world. Of course, no design company would be complete without it, but it's not the only tool you can use in your design process. In the past, a designer would prepare photo-based concepts and then have them converted into vectors. This is a process called image tracing. It's a computer program that does just that, creates vectors based on a digital image. This process allows a designer to manipulate the vector data, and also to create multiple revisions of a single image using the same set of vector points. It's a very cost-effective way to create concepts. Most image tracing companies are using a subset of the vector commands to define the image. They take the image data, find the extreme values, and then they create the vector. So if a designer wants to render a vector version of an Eiffel Tower, for example, they would start with a photo like this: e3d0a04c9c
