Lens correction is back, giving more controls over what it does instead of new features for new lenses, as was the case in Lightroom 4. The latest version of Lightroom allows for some ProPhoto RGB color rendering, an image editor that was once exclusive to Adobe Photoshop and Adobe Photoshop Lightroom. In Lightroom 5, users can adjust the color calibration even more to their own projects. The last new feature is the "Artboard" feature for projects that have been separated into panels. Along with supporting Windows, macOS and iOS, Lightroom 5 is also available from Android, iOS and Windows users in the Google Play and App Store, respectively. However, that's a bit of a bummer for Mac users, because we have one of those among us. With Lightroom 5, you can also take advantage of any of your images or videos when sharing them online. Everything, from snapshots to videos and everything in between, can be exported. This obviously isn't something that's available in other apps, such as videos in Filmora and Facebook Live in Instagram, even if you're able to export all photos as videos.
